JILI Fishing Shooter Odds Guide

Arcade maths, not slot maths — how bet-per-bullet, fish multipliers and kill probability decide the house edge.

JILI's fishing shooters share a lobby with the slots but obey a different rulebook. This guide pulls that model apart: how the wager is priced per bullet, why a fish's multiplier is a payout conditional on a kill rather than a reward you will collect, and where your skill stops and the random number generator begins. Mechanics only — no platform is recommended and no real-money play is involved.

01 The wager is per bullet

You set a bullet value and fire it at whatever is on screen; every shot costs the bullet value. Turnover is the bullet value times the number of shots, which is why the pace of fire matters so much to your bankroll.

02 A multiplier is a probability

Each fish shows a multiplier, but that is the payout IF a shot kills it, balanced against a matching kill probability. A high-multiplier boss is deliberately hard to kill per shot; a low-multiplier fish dies quickly. The hidden kill chance keeps the house edge intact.

03 Where skill ends

You choose which fish to target, which bullet to use and when to fire a special cannon. But whether a specific shot connects is drawn by the RNG against that fish's kill probability. No amount of aim converts a low kill chance into a landed shot.

04 Return quoted as a range

Effective return drifts with how you play — which fish you favour, whether you chase bosses — so fishing RTP is usually quoted as a band rather than the single fixed tier a slot uses. The in-game panel is the authority.

05 The dry-run trap

A long dry streak is not the game 'holding back' a boss. Kill probability is applied per shot with no memory of previous misses. The boss that finally drops was exactly as likely on your hundredth shot as your first.
